

Hey Meaganbrown2524, we just recieved your recent comments left for (Byron Wilson and papco)

*1. as far as the ID reply things goes, I believe it is a function at B3 to connect Replies to The correct responses, so when you leave us a comment, they give us an ID reply code that is unique to your comment and to also alert you to the fact that we got back at you. So, to answer part 2 of your question, no, you dont need to do it, it's automatic when you leave us a reply, so dont trip.

*2. About the other responses you got from others with negative words about "a guy" is also cool to know, because we've already assumed that correctional officers have been assigned to monitor all inmate communications, and some, not all of them really have formed negative dispositions of incarcerated people.

Dont get me wrong, some people have done, and are falsely accused of doing terrible things, and I myself am not qualified, nor authorized to create communication barriers between nobody, and thank you for staying with us inspite others attempting to do whatever it is thats going on.

*3. We invite all comments from society, and we invite dialogue from those that dont always agree with us, infact, more people need to be expressive, and not turn tail and run when others express themselves, but in anycase, not thinking the same way doesnt constitute that people are terrible. Why blog? So please dont wonder if we really enjoy people responding, we do.

- #4. Thank You for being on point about people changing. In fact, I've been here on deathrow since 1997 and I'm not the same person I was then, and I'm sure you are not the same person you were almost 20 years ago, nobody is, some people change for the better, and age and decay changes others in natural ways.
- #5. The "wait until he gets out" comments are again, fearful prejudices we do to each other. Funny thing is that although I'm unable to speak on behalf of sociopaths, I can say for myself that I can't wait to get out because both of my kids have made me a grand father 😊, and the grand babies have added to my long list of reasons why getting out of prison is a good thing. Moreover, perhaps those that "blog in venom", and watch too many movies, and have become experts that continue to victimize themselves with fear should blog with us, create a catharsis and become more involved with ending prejudice.
- #6. Meagan, people like you are needed more in society, because in your own words you said "I was being honest and in the very, nicest possible way." That's an attribute that all of us could use in the blog life. Again, thank you for just being you, and stand your ground on peace. Looking forward to your next comment.

— XYZZ8t

(P.S.)

You're amazing, love our chats.

Almost forgot, could you please let us know which one of us you transcribed for which that person responded, or, just post those comments so we can see them in your next response because we at (papco) don't do rude, and that author may not see a (papco) due to BTB posting the work of other prisoners on our headers.

(We are responsible for our work).

In anycase, we want to draw people to our blog, not push people away and never want to offend people to the level of saying one of us is a terrible person, those are strong words. So the fellas are interested.

I experienced something similar years ago, I had some guy named Paul respond to an interview I did with "@Golgotha" / Scrappy Dog, and this Paul person came at us racially snide. I personally responded to his pro-George Zimmerman statements, sternly, and with class, as Paul implied that black on black murders should disqualify us from viewing the Trayvon Martin Murderer with open contempt, who by the way has had his own problems, and the sickening gall to auction off the gun he used to kill Trayvon; not something I've seen in black on black murder, in NO American era. —Xzyzot