

Something To Talk About:

"Can Relationships Develop, Continue, and Last Without Sex?"

I think everyone wants to find love, companionship, their soul-mate, sex, and all that month of February stuff. That shouldn't exclude the incarcerated. However, I've never really been involved in a serious relationship without sex. So, being incarcerated and trying to find the woman for me is a new experience. I mean, can relationships really develop in prison? Think about it! I mean, if you are currently involved with someone sexually, do you think you would be involved without sex? What would be the reasons for remaining involved if there were no sex? Without sex, what could be accomplished, gained, lost, and or learned? For me, when I was free from incarceration, sex was great and important. When I had sex, I felt appreciated and good at something. I felt loved and needed by my partner. So I gave sex to my partner upon request and we stayed together as long as we had sex. Now that I'm incarcerated, there is no more sex, no more partner, and ultimately, no more relationship. so what does that mean? I truly believe if sex was still allowed in prison, my previous partner and I would still be involved with each other. Is that just a lust relationship? I don't want that! I want something that is real, a real loving lasting kind of relationship. That is something I think can develop, continue, and last without the involvement of sex no matter who or where you are. So yes, I think relationships can develop, continue, and last without sex, but it doesn't mean that they will. I think it all depends on the people involved. What do you think?
