

"Geek Love" 2-14-12

Today is Valentine's Day? So What. Unless you've got a wife or girlfriend that you trust to be true, it's a pointless holiday in here. But for those getting out there is hope, if you know where to look. Recently on TLC, there was a for us nerds and geeks. "Geek Love" is a show about people at ComicCon speed dating. Almost all are dressed as their favorite sci-fi, fantasy and comic book characters. People like me meeting in a venue for people like me. No matter the roles I've played throughout my life, most of them bad, I can't change what I am. Nor would I. Having been in love before, I've never really known love. Always questioning those that love me, Never believing or trusting them. It has more to do with my neurosis than the girlfriend. Being told my interests are childish and pedestrian and being told to give them for love. Fuck that. So watching "Geek Love" I can't help but smile for those fellow geeks meeting their potential loves. Happy and envious, and can't help but to pine for my own shot. Because, even though I celebrate and applaud someone else's happiness, I can't help but look at these beta males and think to myself, I'm ok. I've got just as much chance as anyone of these guys do at finding love. But alas noone wants an ex-con who loves Star Wars and metal. But, that's o.k. really. for all those geeks and normals who're lucky enough to find love, hold onto it. I was going to do a bunch of puns here like "Love long and prosper" but you get it right! Anyway happy V.D. every body! Just kidding with the VD thing, just my love for irony.

hartagram by H.I.M.
The most Metal Valentines Day
thing around. Rock On!