

"PHONEJUSTICE"

June 5, 2012 - Tuesday - 11:09 pm Good evening readers of Phonejustice - Tonight I received a post card from Between The Bars - inviting me to write this piece on the cost of making phone calls from prison. Sadly - being on Florida's death row means the only time I will have phone privileges is when my death warrant is signed - which did happen in 1987 - at that time I was allowed to make two - fifteen minute phone calls a week, and the person I called had to be on my visiting list. That was twenty-five years ago, and tonight as I write this the threat of my death warrant being signed again is a real possibility. But I will not be making any phone calls at that time, because I have no one to call. My only mode of communication with the outside world is through correspondence, and thanks to the graciousness of Between The Bars - I now have a blog. My Father's Day will be spent writing for the blog - as I continue on my quest to obtain my vindication of any kind of murder, and never again sit on death watch with no one to call. It's a tragic irony what the cost of a phone call means to me while I retain the long standing hope to overcome that cost...

Respectfully,

Miles Rose

~~http~~ <http://betweenthebars.org/blogs/5296/>