The harshest reality that anyone can face is that in most instances...we create our own circumstances. More times than not I've shifted the blame from one person to another, and accepting responsibility wasn't even an option. The moment I did own my short comings, I was overwhelmed with guilt, embarrassment, sadness, and shame.

However, it was the guilt, embarrassment, sadness and shame that influenced me to get my act together. I have made a commitment to "Never Again" create my circumstances that destroy my life. Right now in prison I'm treated like an animal, disrespected daily, not taken seriously, separated from the outside world, and deprived of the basic things that make life worth living..."Never Again".

"Never Again" will I create circumstances that result in me being treated less than a man. "Never Again" will I intentionally make decisions that not only impact my life in negative ways, but others as well. "Never Again" will I live recklessly.

Prison is not fun, cool, or the place to be. "Please" spread that message and convince men to take control of their lives...many men in here don't have that chance.

Questions:

Do you need to take control of your life?

What's your "Never Again" moment?
