

The reasons the Pittsburgh Steelers will go 7-9, and miss the Play offs. (1)

First of all, I'm a life time Pittsburgh Steelers Die-hard. I've been following the Pittsburgh Steelers since 1978 (the year Terry Bradshaw won M.V.P.). When a trained football-eye take a look at the Pittsburgh Steelers, one can't help, but wonder, "Why are they losing to unsuccessful teams???" Losses to the Oakland Raiders, before that, The Denver Broncos, and finally (thus far), The Tennessee Titans. I initially thought the problem was the former Steelers offensive coordinator, Bruce Arians. He's history; yet the exact problem is still present. That problem is, offensive play-calling. Normally a team will watch film to seek out the opposing team's weakness; Then, on game day, exploit that weakness. Offensively, The Pittsburgh Steelers don't do that. The Steelers are approaching these games with a run-first, run-second, run-third ~~mentality~~ mentality.

This is a thing that they don't have to do; plus, it is a thing that will cost them their season, if they don't go away from it.

When you have a Quarterback the likes of Ben Roethlisburger, and wide receivers and tight-ends such as Mike Wallace who is probably the fastest man in the N.F.L., Antonio Brown, who is tough and dependable, and last but not least, Heath Miller, an awe-some tight-end, you don't have to run the ball (most of the game).

I believe the Steelers coaching staff (I ^{hope} you read this, Coach Tomlin) must don't realise that they make these games easier for opposing defenses when they don't utilize ~~the~~ their lethal air-attack to the fullest. IF you're running the ball, and NOT getting

First downs, the clock will eventually work against you. Because you speed up the game (clock-wise); plus, you are allowing the opposing team to stay close in the game -

A big MISTAKE!

On the contrary, if the Pittsburgh STEELERS turn Ben Roethlisberger and that dangerous air-attack loose, and sprinkle in a fair amount of deceptive (offensive) plays, these games (especially against weaker teams) will end much differently.

I'm tired of seeing subordinate football teams look like Super Bowl-caliber football teams against the Pittsburgh STEELERS. This is embarrassing, and it needs to STOP!

The Pittsburgh STEELERS no longer have the services of Jerome Bettis ("The Bus"); so, what they must do - immediately - is add deception (to the offense), pass (more) on first downs; This approach will put them in short down and distance situations.

IF the Pittsburgh Steelers continue this game-plan, in punning the ball the bulk of the game, I can guarantee Steelers fans that the Steelers will NOT win one, single road game; plus, they will wind up 7-9.

It is still not too late to turn things around. My guess is that the Baltimore Ravens will lose two more games (at least); i.e., out side of a (possible) lost to the Steelers. So, our playoff hopes (and Super Bowl dreams) are STILL alive.

The code word?
"PASS da ball!" T-T
