

Ronald W. Clarke
November 25, 2012

"DON'T UNDERSTAND"

Page 1 OF 1

I just don't understand it. I've seen women whose genes contain cancer, breast cancer, so they have both breasts removed in order to not develop breast cancer, which is probably a smart idea. That's not the part that I don't understand. No - the part I don't understand is these women turn right around and talk about having children. Bringing a child into the world with the same DNA gene that contains the possibility of cancer, so now that child will have to suffer the same fears that she's currently suffering. And why?

Having children is a very selfish act. It's either done out of lust, or the "individual wanting" to bring a child into this world, for their own selfish reasons, to fulfill their wants and desires. No, I just don't understand it. You live in despair and fear of this gene, yet you then want to bring a child into this world to experience the same despair and fears that you're having to live with.

Humans, our selfishness is amazing! Me, me, me! Yes it's all about me, at least that's the way I see it.

Ronald W. Clarke
November 25, 2012