Kenya Moore

Actress dishes on her latest role as a "Housewife"

You're as beautiful today as you were in the '90s. Is that all natural or the result of plastic surgery?

> I have good genes, and that is it—I swear. No one in my family has touched their face, but if I feel the need to do so, it's no one's business.

Is there any truth to online rumors of you having a "divatude?"

> I am a sweet, compassionate, giving and extremely loyal person. But what confuses people is that I am quick to tell someone how I feel. Passion is sometimes perceived as arrogance.

Reality shows are known for fistfights. Will we see Miss USA cuffing anyone?

> I definitely do not promote violence between women. Even when you see me get passionate, we will never strike each other. It takes a lot of class to not get physical and articulate your feelings.

> IT'S EASY TO say Kenya Moore is synonymous with beauty. Name an African-American household that didn't associate Miss USA 1993 with the comeliness that is all things Black woman: supple lips, full-bodied and coated in flawless milk-chocolate skin. At 41, Moore's done everything from acting to producing. Now, as the newest member of Bravo's hit series, The Real Housewives of Atlanta, she wants to focus on her new reality.

"I've spent the last 18 years in Los Angeles," the Detroit native tells JET. "I am ready for a family, and I felt like I needed to do something different to reach my personal goals. Moving to Atlanta fulfilled that for me."

This season, fans will see whether her tale has the "happily ever after" ending suited for a pageant queen. "It's my real life and I hope viewers understand my focus as a woman," she says. "More than 40 percent of Black women are not married. Marriage is my main goal right now." —by S. Tia Brown
