

Hey Little Pilgrim!!

So glad to hear from you again. I received 2 of your posts today in the mail and am replying to both. Thanks for your comments, and they were very well worded, about my "venting." Sometimes I do feel the need to blow off steam and I have always "cussed like a sailor." It's really just the way I talk. I don't think it's bad--words have only the power which you give them. In any case, I may not achieve much, but I do want to let the folks out there know what's going on, and the way I talk is the way I talk. As for achieving anything, I am known to file complaints/grievances. I have over 155 on record, and I have filed civil suits. With them I also have achieved nothing because the BOP grievance system is set up to fail and the courts go along with the BOP even when they aren't following the law/prior cases/their policies, etc., etc. I am not just saying that, I could give examples of my own. However, I will still keep trying because it bugs the hell out of me when inmates just sit and whine about the way things are, but are willing to do nothing to change them. The only way you can change them is by standing up for your rights, and that's what I try to do. I will admit, though, that I am really, really getting burned out.