Should we resurrect extinct species?

Jurassic Park is still science fiction, but we can already bring many extinct species back to life, National Geographic reports. "De-extinction" has progressed "very much further, very much more rapidly than anyone ever would've imagined," says curator Ross MacPhee of the American Museum of Natural History. Australian scientists say they're about to resurrect an extinct species of frog that gives birth through its mouth, and Harvard scientists are working to bring back the passenger pigeon. Russian researchers even plan to re-create a woolly mammoth from DNA found preserved in Siberian permafrost, though that might still take decades. So far the goat-like Pyrenean ibex is the only extinct species scientists have revived, using cells recovered from the last survivor to clone an offspring that lived for only 10 minutes after its birth, in 2003. Since then, advances in cloning technology have made it possible to bring back any species for which we have even a scrap of DNA—so, not fossilized dinosaurs, but perhaps Neanderthals. Many argue that priority should go to conserving living species: habitat loss, hunting, and climate change could cause the extinction of half of all species by 2100. On the other hand, says Stanford bioethicist Hank Greely, "it just would be so cool to see a woolly mammoth or a saber-tooth tiger or a ground sloth."

Evolution through roadkill

In southwestern Nebraska, the number of cliff swallows killed by cars and trucks has declined over the past 30 years. The surprising reason: The birds have evolved shorter wings, which allow them to pivot away faster from oncoming traffic. Researchers at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln have been studying the swallows since 1982, and recently noticed that fewer of them were becoming roadkill—even though traffic was heavier than ever before and the swallow population was increasing. When they measured the wings of birds that they did find dead on the roadside, they discovered that their average wingspan was a few millimeters longer than that of the rest of the population. Meanwhile, the average wingspan of the population as a whole decreased over the years, probably because, at least near highways, swallows with shorter wings were more likely to survive and reproduce. "Evolution is an ongoing process," University of Tulsa biologist Charles Brown tells DiscoverMagazine.com, and human creations like roads and trucks "exert selection pressures in a way we don't usually think about."

examined the planning skills of people in 76 countries and found that those whose language contains strong "future markers," including speakers of English, Korean, and Russian, were 30 percent less likely to save money than were speakers of languages that use weaker future markers, such as Mandarin, Japanese, and German. In those languages, speakers can use the same verb forms to refer to the present and the future, relying on the context of their conversation to clarify what time they're referring to. That makes them feel that the future is closer, Scientific American reports, causing them to save more for retirement, smoke less, and exercise more than people whose grammar firmly separates now from later.

A dementia epidemic

Alzheimer's and other forms of dementia are afflicting far more Americans than ever before. An alarming new report by the Alzheimer's Association shows that one in three seniors have dementia when they die, and deaths from the disease increased nearly 70 percent between 2000 and 2010. "It's an epidemic, it's on the rise, and currently there is no way to delay it, prevent it, or cure it," neuroscientist Maria Carrillo tells NPR.org. As deaths from diseases like cancer, AIDS, and stroke have declined,

Alzheimer's: An ever-more-common fate

Alzheimer's rates have risen because people are living longer. Some 5 million Americans now have Alzheimer's or related dementia, and as baby boomers age, that figure is expected to jump to nearly 14 million by 2050. As "simply staggering" as those numbers are, says Francis Collins, director of the National Institutes of Health, funding for Alzheimer's research still lags far behind the billions allocated for treating and curing AIDS, diabetes, heart disease, and cancer. Researchers say many people don't realize that Alzheimer's devastates the body—including lowering a person's ability to fight infection—as well as the mind, making the disease not just disabling but deadly.

Health scare of the week Painful zipper mishaps

The men's room can be a dangerous place. Over the past decade, more than 17,500 people in the U.S.—almost always men—have sought emergency room treatment after trapping their genitals in the teeth of their trouser zippers. For the most part, "this is a pain issue," researcher Herman Singh Bagga of the University of California, San Francisco, tells NBCNews.com. "It can completely ruin your night." Occasionally, a zipper injury requires surgery, including unwanted circumcision. More often, the biggest risk is infection by the multitude of bacteria that a penis tends to harbor: "It's important once you get it out from the zipper that it's washed well, and you use a little antibiotic ointment," Bagga says. Wearing underwear and avoiding distractions while zipping can help prevent an accident. For those who do get stuck, the key is not to panic—and, if easing the zipper down doesn't work, to seek professional help. Bagga says there is no standard medical procedure for freeing sufferers; current methods employ everything from mineral oil to screwdrivers and wire cutters.

The future-tense effect

Grammar puts English speakers at a distinct disadvantage when it comes to saving money or practicing healthy habits. A new study suggests that people who speak languages that use different verb tenses to distinguish between the present and the future—for instance, saying "I'm going to" or "I will" when describing an action they'll take later—are much worse at planning than people who speak languages that blur the present and the future. # REDD HOT COMIC

By JORIAN L. SEAY

HE PLAYED A HOT-TEMPERED, raspy-voiced junk dealer on the popular 1970s TV series Sanford and Son. In real life, John Sanford, aka Redd Foxx (pictured above in 1961 with manager, Finis Henderson II) was a hardworking entertainer and Renaissance comedian, performing on-screen, releasing party records (spoken comedy) and playing stand-up nightclubs across the country. Born in St. Louis, at age 13, he began playing the washboard in a band and cleaning dishes. Early in his career, the comic met Malcolm Little (later known as Malcolm X), who referred to Foxx as the "funniest dishwasher on Earth." Foxx swiftly became notorious for his blue humor, a genre of provocative comedy too ribald for White clubs. He died in 1991 at age 68 after suffering a heart attack on the set of his new television series, The Royal Family.

Vampire Holiday: The Passing of Chavez

By Mumia Abu-Jamal

The death of Venezuelan president Hugo Chavez has brought out the malicious and carnal glee of the corporate press, who report breathlessly not only of his mortal passing, but an end to the Bolivarian Revolution. They are the voices of their vampire Wall Street bosses, who delight in owning more of the Earth, no matter how much misery they may cause for millions.

In fact, Chavez was beloved by the vast majority of Venezuelans, poor, Indian and African, who saw in him their rising in the world. Upon his death, seven nations declared days of mourning in his honored memory – Cuba, Chile, Uruguay, Argentina, Bolivia, Ecuador, and Iran. Ecuador's president, Rafael Correa, decreed three days of mourning, and called Chavez an inspiration of the revolutionary transformation sweeping throughout Latin America. Argentina's president, Cristina Kirchner, also ordered three days of mourning to mark the passing of Chavez.

For millions of Latin Americans, Chavez brought dignity to them by refusing to play the puppet for "El Norte," the U.S. Empire. He helped found ALBA, the international Latin American bank, and became, in Fidel Castro's retirement, a son of his spirit, who learned from his mentor how to resist the Empire.

How many of us know that CITGO provided low-cost heating oil to over 1-1/2 million Americans, and that CITGO, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Venezuelan Oil, did so with Chavez's blessing?

When he took to the rostrum of the U.N., and said, "The Devil was here yesterday, and that the place smelled of sulfur, he was a global hit – except for U.S. puppets. The "devil" was U.S. imperialism, still a dangerous, drone-invading, bomb-dropping threat to millions world-wide.

Chavez, on the other hand, was loved and admired by millions, both in and out of Venezuela.

Viva Hugo Chavez!

Black Superman?! A Hero Against Racism for the Hood!

Christopher Dornier woke up the world to the barbaric nature of the racist L.A.P.D and other so-called law enforcement officers that patrol our community like an occupying army in Afghanistan or Iraq. He told the oppressor, I prefer to die on my feet than live on my knees. His courageous actions have shown us that the oppressor is NOT completely bulletproof, and yes, racist pigs do bleed! Contrary to popular petty-bourgeois belief, he did not want his damn corrupt job back. He wanted to be accepted back into the warm embrace of the Black community, after he almost betrayed us by accepting being in the racist police and white supremacist military. He tried to change the scandalous system from the inside, and it betrayed HIM and US as a people! He proved to us (by his actions) that he only joined them to steal the racist white man's killing skills!

Poor oppressed Black people (the lumpen proletariat) all over the country, who have been constant victims of police terrorism, have given him his honor and good name back. Despite what the racist mainstream news media say, he will live on in the hearts and minds of oppressed Black people still struggling to be free from Racism, Capitalism and Imperialism. Black people must unite to serve and defend the Black community.

Even though Chris Dornier supposedly died and has become a martyr, the racist police are still alive and armed to the teeth waiting for a chance to get revenge on ALL Black people. The trigger-happy pigs act like judge, jury, and executioners. They illegally shot 3 innocent people driving two different trucks in the search for Dornier.

If you read the Internet social media, you will find that Black people in every ghetto are waking up and saying things like:

"Racist Amerika's evil karma has returned..."

"Y'all can dish it out but y'all can't take it..."

"What goes around comes around..."

"Chris Dornier is a little bit of Nat Turner, Geronimo Pratt, and Robert Williams all rolled up into one person. Nat was ruthless, Geronimo was in the military, Robert went on the run..."

"The police should be the ones banned from having guns, they're the biggest GANG in Los Angeles..."

"The chickens have really come home to roost..."

Christopher Dornier embarrassed the L.A.P.D when he exposed that the same police involved in the Rodney King beating, Rampart scandal, and May Day beating have all been rewarded with promotions to high rank. That means they are issuing genocidal orders to low-ranking paramilitary officers that work in the streets. Nothing has changed, it has only gotten worse.

The Black Riders declare " We ride for an immediate end to POLICE BRUTALITY and MURDER of Black people. We ride because we believe we can end police brutality in our black community by organizing Black self-defense groups dedicated to defending our Black community from racist police oppression and brutality. The 2nd amendment to the U.S Constitution gives a right to bear arms. We therefore believe that all Black People should arm themselves for self-defense."
