

Don't Rush! (pt. 1)

April 29th

When we feel hurt and rejected there's something inside us that wants to prove we're still worthy and desirable; as a result we can jump into the next relationship too quickly. Basically this is done to show your ex or tell them in a nonverbal gesture, "you see, I told you I'd find someone else." But just like an infant doesn't go from crawling to driving overnight there's a process involved, and if you try to circumvent it you'll end up back at square one, alone! But sometimes being alone isn't such a bad thing. It will help you subjugate your emotions and assist the configuration of your thoughts. But a new relationship won't successfully heal you, avoid aggravating inflicted wounds, or instantly clean up a mess. . . . Regardless of the temporary bliss, old emotions shall rehash themselves without fair warning. And if you're in a new relationship when they do, your companion shall receive the blunt force of these old emotions. How fair is that? So take your time. . . . These things can't be feigned. . . . rushed or. . . . pursued. They'll be given to you when you're ready, and not a moment sooner. . . . you want the real deal this time. . . . and God wants to be your filter, so in order to reach the treasure of your heart, a person must first pass through Him. Don't rush or be so quick to take the edge off your pain that you run ahead of God. It takes time for Him to make you into the person He wants you to become. While He's preparing you, He's working on the heart of the right person to show up at the right time. His time is always on time! So in the meantime there's a way to fill the emptiness inside you; work on developing a closer relationship with God.
