

To JT:

You're right, something is usually better than nothing; and in my situation, that something might not be much, but at least it's not nothing--it is something. Some of my posts may seem vehemently infused, or even retaliatory, but such should be somewhat expected, considering. I figure, for me to get anything constructive done under these circumstances, is a great personal accomplishment.

I think some people reading my posts forget that.

They assay each word in want of some demonic substantiation, in order to warrant my suffering to be sub silentio, and without grievance. Those who put me here, take childish pleasures in it, and wish to prolong this breach of Constitution; it's why they tremble at the idea of truth getting out, having an actual venue to listening ears outside their control. My silence was their expectation, and hope--but I'm an American, and one thing we Americans will always have at our disposal, the right to talk, and speak out our mind.

It's good to see that some people, such as yourself, can read these posts and view them intellectually, and even with unbiased empathy; rare attributes today.

I thank you for reading my blog, and for commenting. I forget which president said it--Kennedy perhaps--that, humanity is the most important thing we can extend to others, and express from within us.
