

JOHNNY MAHAFFEY SAYS:
"Morality Rebounds"

06.30.14

There seems to be a reinstatement of integrity, spreading across South Carolina these past few months, and it's not isolated to this one state. Could the Millennials be getting the hint? Are they not quite the "me me generation," they are so famed to be? Millennials are entering not just the managerial lots, but the political "Boss Hog" dominions as well--and they're not liking what they see apparently.

There's a short report/opinion piece on local news entitled:

"Perspective"
(wistv.com)

This past Friday's topic: corruption in South Carolina, Boss Hog mentality of running office, and the need for its end. A true me me attitude has permeated nearly every office of sheriff, and prosecutorial district, long before the arrival of any Millennials. The delusions of grandeur shared by some baby boomer relics, and their X-gen confidants, are being exposed as they continually attempt to hand tainted stacks of cash (usually in the form of jobs, promotions, etc.) to newbies, who know it's smarter to expose the corrupt than to join them. Some late X-gens, and many early Millennials are not only doing this exposing, but serving the search warrants on these misguided officials; these newbies--to their predecessors dismay--do not share in the delusions, gladly taking witness stands against them.

Perspective's host made a nice close with saying South Carolina is fed up with the corruption, and it's past time for the Boss Hog (I love that comparison) ways of running things to go! She covered things like the FBI agents that are currently (at this time) perusing files, and belongings of a local sheriff, after serving warrants on "his" office, along with other high ranking "officials" in S.C. going through court hearings and their own investigations concerning immoral behaviors. It wasn't long ago that the governor herself was put through the shame of immorality by the Ethics Committee, and don't even get me started on her predecessor. And lets not forget the state's current "attorney general," and his ragtag band of "solicitors," also being in the immoral spotlight!

Change is coming.

The most recent installment of Psychology Today (August 2014, pages 10 & 12) has an article related to this issue, entitled "Attitude Adjustment," by Matt Huston, featuring a graph by Social Psychological and Personality Science (released April 2014), showing "Youth Values Before and After the Financial Crisis," how integrity dropped drastically from the 1970s up to the 2004-06 shame years of U.S. history (the years my own life was invaded homewreckers), when National values hit a low. Youths, underwent what I call
