When You're Me

By Muslim Mansa Lutalo Iyapo

It makes me wanna holler at the top of my lungs, but I'm guilty as charged therefore the holler never comes.
"Helping the brother-man against the other man" is a response I often use, when a brother asks "what's happening?" or "what you been up to?"
Words followed by action even if the action is limited to words that dare to speak truth to power and knock the brains out of falsehood.

It's not and never will be all good...
Not as long as I know my rights,
Not as long as I'm able to give people trapped in the dark some light,
Not as long as I'm able to hear for those who can't hear, because you refuse to send new hearing aid batteries for what he calls his "other ears."
Not as long as I'm able to stay focused without snapping,
Not as long as I can make it happen through action.
Not as long as racial disparities exist,
Not as long as... well, you already know what's on my list.

Now here I sit, as a consequence of my conduct, in an empty cell, all property boxed up in a warehouse... waiting for tomorrow, when I'll be shipped hours up north to a different slave plantation.

When you're me, you simply acknowledge that it comes with the territory, and shake that dirt off your back and take a step up, just like that "donkey" story.

When you're me, you pause to reflect on the few good people you've met, and come to the realization that these people you will never forget.

When you're me, you understand that it's divide and conquer, and yet spend more than half of 20 years in segregation and still prosper.

When you're me, you don't have time to lick your wounds because the blows are steady coming, you train yourself to lock your pain away deep down in your emotional dungeon.

When you're me, you get down on your knees in prayer and ask for strength and wisdom.
If you have strength the size of a mustard seed you will get all that you asked for and then some.

When you're me, you will be able to read this and say to yourself you feel just like me, and if you do, you'll know that it never was about me, but about we.

When you're me.

broken parole system

By JERRY HANCOCK

Many people concerned with the injustice that is rampant in Wisconsin prisons read with interest the Journal Sentinel article that the state Department of Corrections had found a way to maneuver the state personnel system to give six prison wardens raises of from 8% to 13%. There is no doubt that being a warden is a job with great responsibility that deserves fair compensation. But why can't the Department of Corrections use the same creativity to fairly review the nearly 3,000 inmates who are currently legally eligible for parole?

In addition to my position as director of the Prison Ministry Project, I am the former administrator of the Division of Law Enforcement Services in the Wisconsin Department of Justice. As a result of my experiences in the criminal justice system, I have no illusions about crime and criminals. I have sat with rape victims and the families of murder victims, and I have listened to victims tell how their lives have been changed forever. But by spending time in prison, I have learned how offenders and their families also suffer.

Recently, the Department of Corrections announced "about 95% of the men and women eligible for parole are violent criminals." That is untrue. All of those men and women were violent criminals. The question is how many are still violent criminals? The judges who sentenced them under "old law" assumed that the parole system would give them a fair chance to change. Maybe some have. Maybe some have not. What is true is that all old law inmates have lost a fair chance at parole.

It is also clear from recent reports that even when inmates are granted the possibility of parole, the Department of Corrections refuses to implement those plans. This creates a cruel and heartbreaking cycle for the inmates and their families who have hope restored by the Parole Commission only to be taken away by a bureaucracy accountable exclusively to the governor.

The Department of Corrections also announced that politics play no part in parole decisions. In fact, politics are at the very heart of parole decisions. Gov. Scott Walker apparently believes that people convicted of crime cannot change. That is why he, as a state legislator, was one of the authors of Truth in Sentencing, why he refuses to grant pardons and why paroles have virtually come to a standstill. The secretary of the Department of Corrections and the chair of the Parole Commission were appointed to implement Walker's view of human nature.

That view is not morally or factually supportable. Every major faith tradition believes in the possibility that people can change. In my own Christian tradition — which I share with the governor — at the heart of Christian forgiveness is the possibility that people can change. But change is also a fact.

A Stanford University study of 860 murderers paroled between 1990 and 2010 showed that none committed another murder and only five committed any new crime, for a recidivism rate of 0.006%.

Some people who are in prison need to be there. But those people in prison who are legally eligible to be released, and who have used their time in prison to change, need the fair chance to come home as the law allows.

If the governor really believes in the moral principle of change or the principle of fiscal responsibility, he can prove it by ordering an immediate review of the 421 parole-eligible inmates in minimum or community custody. The release of these inmates, who have met the Department of Corrections' own standards of safety, would save taxpayers more than $12 million a year and restore some credibility to a broken and unfair system. It also would help pay for those extraordinary pay increases for wardens.

The Rev. Jerry Hancock is director of the Prison Ministry Project.

Tell me and I forget.

Teach me and I remember.

Involve me and I learn.
