Hi Alysso,

Sorry I didn't respond right away, but for the future I will reply sooner. I sort of got caught off guard from your questions, but I'm like a person that is blunt and to the point. Now on to your questions. The way I deal with missing women in prison. I try to network alot so that I can stay intune with women, like writing or phone calls, but I also try not to let it get me all sad or depressed, women are the most beautiful creatures on the planet, so it's easy to get caught up in missing them their so important without them there would be no us "men" I think some men may disagree not being around a woman, you miss a woman more, you realize how valuable that a woman could be, for presence, for smile, for awarmess. I can't speak for those people who lose touch with a woman when released, because I ~~was~~ been down 26 years and haven't got out, but I can assume a person getting out and haven't been in society with a woman in so long, how awkward that would feel, not knowing how a woman would react to certain things, like how you have sex, how would a person act if to say if you went out on a date with a person and another man tried talking to her, not being in that situation in so long, I'd just leave cause nothing will ever bring me back to that situation. A man dealing with their needs need to be patient and take one day at a time. Being gone so long a person does lose touch with society, therefore a person need that woman that can help guide them back into society.

Some people become sensitized, I'm not one of them, I feel when they let me go which hopefully is this year, I feel
I know how to adapt, one must take it one day at a time I hope this answers some of your questions. If this day is okay if I could correspond with you directly. If you feel you don't want me to have your address, you could get a PO Box. I loved your questions, I would like to have more of them Take care
