I got your response and I am humbled by your words. I think you're the only one I still hear anything back from. It means alot that you remember me and think so highly of me. Believe it or not I have changed in so ways both good and bad. I have continued though to not let my life in this place behind these bars to hinder me in anyway. Truly I believe when my mom passed away it helped me see life through unclouded and unselfish eyes. I have been humbled by the value and the beauty of life itself and wonder why I took my won for granted when my mom who was an amazing person was taken away fromt his world so quickly and she loved life even more than I could ever understand everyday she was sick and you'd never know it. I am due to get my answer from parole any day now and I hope like crazy that this time I make it. I know beyond everything I have made greater mistakes than other and I miss my kids each day is a reminder of their pain and my own but nothing can change the past only I can do better in the future. I Have been a basket case of late and still manage to sit down and accomplish things. I have graduated Bridges to Life and am now an Encourager which has put me in the fram of mind of those people I have hurt, even myself. You know I would deliberately do things to hurt myself like the type of people I chose to be with in the past. I hope to be home before my birthday this year but even any yes is fine with me. I am trying to work on getting some where to stay upon my release but you know it's hard with my situation and the judgements people pass on me. I would write you directly but no address. I hope that all is well for you out there and that you are safe from all that bad and that you continue to make great choices. Nothing like A BONSAI tree to get you going??? Yes, I remember that...
