Subject: 62° F for Christmas Day?

Climate change?

I can understand the arguments on both sides of the "climate change" issue.

*

Here in the Mid-West, just 2½ hours South West of Chicago we set a new all time record of 62°F for Christmas Day. Two days before that I noticed the first 2-large groups of Geese flying South. I am not from this area, but I did think it was odd that Geese were flying South in December. I'm pretty sure it much earlier in the season in the past 10 years that I've seen this amazing life of nature.

Personally, growing up in the North East I do miss the snowy Winters.

It was still a beautiful Christmas Day here and peaceful.

So even if the fears are all false regarding climate change, I think developing technology with a smaller carbon footprint will help generations to come. To some degree (ozone) it is already proven scientifically. Shouldn't we do what is best for the future of humanity and for the care of the Earth?

*

It's more about greed and money. We can retrain people for newer tech. So who is that really blocks these efforts?

Thoughts for a new year.
