

Hellow Again!

It's been quite a while since I've posted one of my blogs.

As you can see by briefly looking through my past postings, most of all of my blog topics are political in nature. Simply put: "That is because I happen to be a Politico". And politics still remains my primary interest. (Even after "Bernie" dropped out of the campaign.)

Covid 19 has certainly put life on hold for a time, but I do hope you folks did not suffer too much other than taking a brief time out from work maybe.

But now that people are back online with their life & living larger than before the bug I thought that you folks might want to see this new blog of mine. It relates to a new topic also. One I think may interest you more than my past political rhetoric. I hope so anyway.

This updated blog I've posted is about my Family Royal Heritage. At least, the Royalty I speak of has thus far been verified, (short of taking one of those special D.N.A. test's designed for that kind of thing.) to be genuine [According to the qualified researchers I have sought out & received verification from.].

The picture is of a Castle in Northern England which is in a town having the same name as my own. As the Castle too is called "Ogle". They say every picture tells a story. This picture should carry volumes of stories along with it. The picture shows what appears to be an estate, maybe not very old in it's appearance, although the reason for that being because it was rebuilt from ancient Castle remains which it once was. Thus, what you see is a 17th Century rebuilt estate, built back up from the ruins of the Castle it once was many centuries before.

Now, to pause & explain for you why it should be related to Royalty. That is because the Ogle Family, which this particular Castle was named, was once considered to be great Barons throughout that area of England they called Northumberland County. There are many other Castles, Towers, Estates, Churches & Mansions throughout that same area which were either built & occupied briefly, inhabited by, bought or sold to, & so forth by those Ogle Barons back then.

To specifically spell out for you why the Ogle's were Royalty. There have been a number of descendants who are a branch of genetic bloodline that are entitled "Plantagenet" Royals. Meaning, a Royal Family bloodline very well known in England & throughout the rest of Europe as having been rulers of England for many years. Even King Richard the Lion Heart was of those descendants. As was the legendary King Edward I (Longshanks). These Plantagenet Royals left their mark on England predominantly more significant than the other Royal Family rulers sitting on the throne. To mention a few of those marks left by Plantagenets:

- 1) They held the throne for a couple of centuries at once.
- 2) They were the most proficient builders of Castles throughout England.
- 3) They were somewhat involved with the War of Roses.
- 4) They initiated & developed the original legal system of England, (which was later adopted throughout the rest of Europe, then the rest of Western Civilization). Beginning with Common Law. Parliamentary Government. They wrote & adopted the Magna Carta. And so on & so forth.

The Royal Dynasty of this Royal Plantagenet Family did not cease until the last of their Kings was eventually murdered & his throne was stolen from him.
