

Date: 7/27/2020 12:53:32 AM

Subject: Reply ID: Blog4HR

George Orwell Would Be Smiling... Or crying

Created 26 July 2020

By Nate A. Lindell

In Orwell's classic novel, 1984, the government used doublespeak, making it easier for them to convince people that slavery was "freedom," by calling freedom "slavery." That book, for those familiar with it, is extraordinarily relevant in America today, where our President has finally succeeded at "Making America Great Again."

Think about it:

- we have the greatest percentage of our citizens sick with corona virus;
- we have the greatest percentage of our citizens in prisons, three or four times more on probation or parole (or, in doublespeak, "extended supervision");
- our President has the greatest number of friends/frenemies convicted of crimes related to getting him elected;
- our President has had the greatest number of women accuse him of rape, sexual assault, or sexual harassment of any previous U.S. President (Bill Clinton's then henchman, George Stephanopoulos, might've saved Bill from beating Trump - he intimidating Clinton's accusers from coming forward), while having the greatest number of morally upstanding, God-fearing Christians supporting him (in the sacred hope that he'll start Armageddon in Israel, thus forcing Jesus to come back...);
- we have the greatest number of citizenry shooting each other to death, the greatest number of guns (many assault rifles, military-grade weaponry) in the hands of...anyone;
- we have the greatest number of protests against police brutality & racism, the greatest number of not-so secret police responding with more brutality & disappearings of protestors, challenging the greatness of those that our CIA supported in Latin American puppet states;
- we have the greatest number of patriots and freedom fighters, willing to risk their lives (and the lives of others) by refusing to wear face masks, throwing parties where they spread COVID-19 -- and those same patriots support police officers' right to choke & shoot Black people to death.

Well, now Trump can ride off in the sunset. America has been made "great" again.